

A Place for Unicorns

Lindsay has a great ability to cut to the chase while still allowing the reader to wallow in her beautiful lyrical style . . . If you haven't read her Diving Through Clouds, A Place for Unicorns or Eden Fading, you are missing out. Big time. Irish Independent

An extraordinary read . . . a wonderful, wonderful book written with great humour. Beautifully written. RTE Open House

This is a tale by that is, by turn, whimsical and funny, poignant and passionate . . . Seamus Hosey, RTE

Anna wakes sweating and terrified. Over the past few weeks her dreams have become more vividly alarming – the sense of being lost is so real.

Eight year old Anna arrives in Pisa with her mother, the very beautiful but selfish Rosalind, for an Italian holiday. While Rosalind seems happy and carefree, Anna is homesick for her father David who has been left behind in disgrace. He drinks too much and Rosalind knows he is unfaithful.

Their Italian idyll is shattered by a fatal car crash that leaves Rosalind in a wheelchair and forces their return to England where David must take care of his embittered and angry wife and his unhappy daughter.

Further devastating events bring Anna to the wild but beautiful Ballynacarrig in the West of Ireland to live with her eccentric Aunt Pog.

As she grows into a young woman, Anna continues her search for the love and affection she was so starved of in her youth. Is Anna to be unlucky in love or can her faith be restored by the handsome Benny?
